Question 2 Part	Marks awarded	Marks available	Comments
(a)	6	10	The context of the answer is quite well put, and the answer to the question is reasonable. The point about reducing tax as a market-based supply-side policy is quite well developed, although it needs to be linked to competition or international competitiveness. The increase in aggregate demand in the diagram is not relevant. The next point on how international competitiveness is improved by supply-side policies is relevant but could be linked more effectively to the policy. This answer is quite effective in places, but it needs to be specific on how the supply-side policies improve domestic competition. Six marks are awarded.
(b)	9	15	The context of the question is quite well put, although the definition of unemployment is not accurate. The diagram is correct, but it could be more complete. The explanation of how education can create more employment is a reasonable one. The point about subsidies for firms to invest in technology is not well related to the problem of unemployment. There is an attempt to use real-world evidence (RWE), but it could be developed more fully. A relevant evaluative point is made on technology reducing employment opportunities. The remaining evaluative points on negative externalities and "brain drain" could be developed more clearly. The second diagram is not well explained. The alternative policy on the market-based supply side is not developed. There are some relevant theoretical points, a diagram, RWE and evaluation. However, the answer needs to be developed further. Nine marks are awarded.
