Question 3 Part	Marks awarded	Marks available	Comments
(a)	8	10	The opening section shows a good understanding of economic growth and development. The point about poor governance affecting aggregate demand is quite well made. The diagram works, but the analysis in the text and the point about long-run aggregate supply could be clearer. The point about women not being able to work is an effective social factor, and this aspect is linked to development. The point about the poverty trap is quite well made, but it could be linked more effectively to a barrier to growth and development. The poverty cycle is relevant and related to economic development. The question is answered, and a diagram and some effective theory are provided, but they need more precision. Eight marks are awarded.
(b)	9	15	A real-world example of the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) is introduced at the start of the answer, but the use of terminology could be more effective. The next section lists a number of economic barriers, but the explanation needs to be more fully developed. The next section on unemployment as a barrier is supported by a diagram, but the theory could be more accurately explained. The point about DRC's higher imported grain costs is quite well made, and there is a good discussion about the fall in the prices of cobalt and copper, its main exports. Both these points are linked to how this might cause a fall in the DRC's currency and its impact on growth and development. This theoretical answer is quite effective. A diagram has been provided, as has a real-world example. The weakness lies in the lack of evaluation. Nine marks are awarded.
