Example 2: HLP1

Subject: Economics

Component: HL paper 1

Question 1 Part	Marks awarded	Marks available	Comments
(a)	7	10	The first paragraph clearly shows understanding of the specific demands of the question, which are subsequently addressed. Although examples are not explicitly sought for responses in part A, candidates are likely to use them when explaining areas of theory such as market structure. However, the examples provided do not seem to be useful or representative of these market structures. The response includes more diagrams than necessary for the question. They are not particularly well explained, and that detracts from the other qualities in this response. The explanation of theory is quite clear, and the question is answered. A clear distinction between the two market structures is established.
(b)	11	15	The explanation of the diagram is not quite right. The distinction between the allocatively efficient output and the monopoly supply is taken to be a shortage although there is no shortage at the monopoly price. However, in other respects, the diagram is explained. The presented economic theory is relevant and is explained. There is an attempt to introduce real-world examples, but there is limited use of them. A range of arguments has been presented, but their use is hindered by limited support from the examples selected. The developed synthesis is mostly balanced.
